Contemporary American Art

AMERICAN art is rooted in tradition, if you recognize tradition for what it is, not a formula but a habit of mind. Back in the eighteenth century, when the artists of Boston, Philadelphia and New York were occupied in painting portraits, following a mode derived from the British school of that period, they were concerned with two things. They sought to register the truth and in the process they cultivated an ideal of good workmanship. They put a portrait together with judgment; in composition it was not markedly original but it was sound. Their draughtsmanship was polished. Their color was in good taste. By the standards of today they would be adjudged "academic." Perhaps they were. But their fundamental virtues are those which are recognizable in the best work of all the schools, truth and craftsmanship. These are the virtues which have persisted with us down to the present time.

Copley and Stuart transmitted them to the next generation. They are discernible in the portraits painted by such men as Sully, Morse, Chester Harding and Neagle. They appear in the works of those men who were born before the Civil War and lived after that historic epoch. Technique for its own sake was not exploited until a later date but technique zealously developed as a means to an end was very characteristic of some of our most famous pioneers. You see it in the landscapes of such men as George Inness, Homer Martin and Winslow Homer. It distinguishes the most varied and powerful of our older figure painters, John La Farge. Then, when the Philadelphia Centennial gave a new impetus to study and experiment, technique became the preoccupation of the entire school.

The younger men went abroad, largely to Paris, and under the masters of the Salon, leaders like Gerome, Lefebvre, Laurens and so on, applied themselves to problems of construction, drawing, modeling, brushwork, all the things that are essential to the well made picture. There were other influences, besides that of Paris, which had an effect in the renovation of our school. Frank Duveneck, with the inspiration he drew from the old masters of Holland, was a potent figure. But the important point is that the rising generation was above all interested, as Stuart had been, in the rectitude of art, in the mastering of its instruments. New currents were to flow into the stream. Whistler was to develop and to contribute new ideas of tone and pattern to portraiture and to make an even more striking contribution in his "Nocturnes," the most original things in modern landscape. We took over the impressionistic hypothesis from Claude Monet and his circle. But we never swerved from our central, traditional conception of art as an affair of honest craftsmanship, dedicated to the statement of the truth.

The American artist is, like Theophile Gautier, a man for whom the visible world exists. We have had figure painters of high imaginative power, men like La Farge, A. P. Ryder, Elihu Vedder, and in much of our landscape painting there is a sensitiveness that points to the poetic temperament. Yet we are, on the whole, indifferent to what might be called pictorial narration, to drama, to themes demanding intellectual or emotional activity. The typical American painter is all for the visual and manual triumph and the world well lost. What has saved him from mere virtuosity, from the deadening character of technique exercised in a vacuum, has been his keen interest in life, in the passing spectacle. He will not be anecdotic, he shrinks from sentiment, but he keeps his eye on the object, an eye so searching that it grasps that subject's innermost vitality. Contemporary American art is nothing if not nervous, animated, the tangible record of things sympathetically seen.

Through it runs that traditional conscientiousness at whose origins I have glanced. A latter day portrait painter would not know how to build up a canvas on the lines of, say, Stuart's "Washington"—the Landsdowne type. But he is akin to Stuart in his solicitude for veracity and in his careful workmanship. What is merely academic in the work of the old men has fallen away from their successors. What is lifelike and thoroughgoing remains. There is observable, too, in the American art of today, a rich play of that individuality which is as the sign manual of an independent people. Ours is a racy school. It is singularly impatient of convention. It is fresh, unspoilt. The specific value of this individuality or that I do not here attempt to indicate. Your painter is in part a product of training. His originality is a gift from the gods. It may or may not be of high significance. But that the American artist, for good or for ill, powerfully or feebly, seeks to express himself, to keep out of a rut, is undeniable. On that broad fact the school sustains itself, on its freedom, on its individualized exploitation of the ideal of truth and good workmanship it carries on from the founders.

Contemporary French Art

It seems impossible to speak of the contemporary Art of any nation whatsoever, without referring back to French Art of earlier times.

Without doubt, Italy reigned indisputably over Art in the sixteenth century, but today, in view of the broad international debate which has been begun on the riddle of the French Primitives, who would dare to state that the first masters of the "quatrocentism" and even of "trecentism" were not our old illustrators of the thirteenth century, and especially our creators of the Gardens of Love (Jardins d'Amour) or of the Orchards of Paradise (Vergers du Paradis), promoters of a Gothic renaissance to which every European country was tributary. Their esthetic sense was essentially French and was soon to assert itself even more strongly and to penetrate still more deeply into artistic and foreign centres through the schools of Paris, Bourges, Avignon and the whole of Provence. Let us not forget that the Roman de la Rose Tapestry, which was the inspiration of subsequent artists, was woven nearly a century before the Indivino of the Borromeo Palace in Milan, before the frescoes of Masolino da Panicale and also before the feminine elegancies of Pisanello; but let us pause before a subject so attractive, the slightest development of which would exceed the small proportions of this sketch.

In the seventeenth century, France with its Art solemnly decorative, Spain with Velasquez' genius, the Netherlands with their glorious legion of incomparable technicians, shared amongst them the Empire of Painting.

In the eighteenth century, we see French Art, in all its branches, still shining over the world, while Great Britain is the scene of a late, but brilliant budding-forth of her magnificent and gracious school of painting, the most illustrious representatives of which are Hogarth, Gainsborough, Romney, Raeburn—the English Primitives.

In the nineteenth century, after the classic tyranny of David, and following him, the Academics, we see France transforming the understanding of Art in the universe.

Whether one prefers the traditionalist Ingrès to the inaugurator of Modernism (through Romanticism), Delacroix, one must arrive by way of Courbet, Corot, and Millet, to the profound movement which gave birth to Impressionism with Manet, Renoir, and Monet as its most illustrious protagonists.

These men did not create a theory all at once, but they evolved, after having submitted (Manet amongst others) to the influence, occasionally too obvious, of certain great Dutch and Spanish painters, Hals, Velasquez, Goya . . . . .

Many of these contemporary masters, after whom came such men as Toulouse-Lautrecs, Gaugin, etc., went so far with their evolution that it reached a point almost incomprehensible to those who had not followed them step by step.

The crowd, however, followed the movement created by the unlimited admiration of those who understood these artists, who under the influence of a new doctrine painted with emotional feeling.

From this moment it was evident that Art devotees, whose esthetic sense in other respects has not changed much since then, instead of being moved by the charm of a painting, were trying to show that they understood an artistic theory.

Consider the work of Cézanne, who has influenced modern painters more than anyone else. He was never satisfied with his work, too often left unfinished, yet he it was who pointed out the shining path to artists tired of the subtleties of colour of Impressionism, of the rather deceptive laxity of its construction, and he it was who led them to base their work on solid drawing and taught them not to neglect volume.

Certainly, carried to the extreme, Impressionism was largely surface work and often too great importance was attached to the play of light.

Perhaps reaction went further than was necessary, for, in order to give more solidity to the drawing, the painters cut each surface in squares, in pyramids, in cubes, which robbed their paintings of the little charm they might have possessed.

Now Cubism is dying out. The Theoricians of Art, the sport of their own theories, find themselves bound to return to Ingrès, of whom they claimed to be the disciples in the days of their most daring experiments. But two dangers block their way, which they must avoid at all costs. If they let loose their desire to play with light, they become the victims of Charybdis Impressionism, whereas if they paint softly, they become the prey of Scylla Bouguereau.

That is the reason why so many paintings are either sadly Impressionist or vulgarly Ingrist.

In spite of all, thanks to the sincerity of its researches and laborious experiments, to the variety of its temperaments and theories, to the numerous followers and admirers who invade its studios and salons, French Art continues to lead the world in Esthetics as it has led it right from that far-off period of the Gardens of Love to the painting of scenery in the indicative style of Cézanne.

The greatest painters of all countries come and continue to come to Paris to seek light there, as Buddhists make a pilgrimage to the place of Buddha's incarnation, there to bathe and revive themselves in the sacred waters, and then wend their ways in a totally opposite direction.

British Art at Pittsburgh

THE present collection of works by British painters will be seen to be composed chiefly of what one might call the traditional school. By that I mean those painters who are not desirous of adventuring back to the early primitives or forward to the extreme abstract but of following in the traditions founded on the various schools from Velasquez to the French Impressionists.

One or two of the younger painters exhibiting—such as William Roberts and Paul Nash—have come, it is true, to a certain degree under the modern continental influence; but there are no extreme moderns included in the collection.

Fashions come and fashions go, but a really fine work of art, whatever the manner or method of it, remains so for all time. I think the tendency, conscious or unconscious, of the great majority of works represented is towards a romantic realism. Some one once said: "Realism well seen is Idealism." So one may term it that.

Brutal realism of the kind one used to see sometimes fifteen or twenty years ago in continental exhibitions has never appealed to British artists. There is a vein of poetry in their temperament that forbids it.

Look, for instance, at the work of that fine artist, George Clausen, with his distinguished sense of design and passionate love of the big truths of nature. He paints a farm labourer working in the fields. It is not a mere realistic record of a particular labourer but a symbolic figure invested with all the dignity and poetry of man's unceasing struggle with nature. He never loses sight also of the essential truths of relationship of tone and value which bind the figure to its landscape environment.

Then we have Sir William Orpen, most masterly of realists. One has only to see any of his Irish subject pictures to find a whimsical romance and poetic imagery peeping out at you from every corner; all the legend and folklore of Ireland seem summed up in them. And Ambrose McEvoy, most poetic of painters, is a true descendant of Gainsborough, but entirely personal in method.

I could go on enumerating them: Philip Connard with his intensely personal art and live, decorative sense, a follower of the tradition of Boucher and Watteau; Augustus John with his wonderful, live and masterly sense of style, but arrived at from exploration of every tradition of the past, romantic also; A. J. Munnings, most English of painters, offspring of Stubbs and Rowlandson and the Norwich School—he might well be called the "Dickens of British Painters," with his gypsies and caravans, and all the romance of the road which he loves best of all to paint; Julius Olsson with his romantic vision of the sea; D. Y. Cameron with his poetic landscape; and many more.

I think that this idealism will always remain in English art. True, some of the younger men in England, as elsewhere, are swayed by the violent reaction against what is called representational art, and are exploring methods by which they hope to express in terms of paint many things which have hereto been expressed only by other forms of art. Youth is the time to experiment and every effort that is sincere should meet with encouragement and sympathy. For it is by experiments, which sometimes seem revolutionary, that many additions to art have been gained, especially in landscape.

I believe, however, that most of them will come back with added knowledge to what is after all fundamentally expressive of the natural temperament.

Dutch Painting

With the passing in the 19th Century of the famous school of La Haye, whose adherents were Josef Israels, the two Maris, Gabriels, and others, we see the beginning of the modern Dutch School. The younger generation was not satisfied with the classic traditions and aspired to other ideals which it sought to attain in the so-called newer forms of art. It was the time when the French Impressionism or neo-Impressionism prevailed in Holland.

The most important representative of this new art expression was the Franco-Dutch painter, Vincent Van Gogh, whose works announced the coming School of Expressionism.

At the same time we see in the portraits of Dr. Jan Veth and Haverman a quiet but firm determination to follow realism. This realism is even more pronounced perhaps in the paintings of Breitner. Witsen, Karsen, and Voerman, are more hesitating, more reserved; Bauer, de Moor, and Professor Jurres, more mysterious, more romantic.

Another movement, analogous to that of French Symbolism, developed about the year 1890, in which the emphasis is placed on the religious side, as in the work of Dr. der Kinderen, while the well ordered sense of decorative arrangement is manifested in the works of Professor Roland Holst.

A third movement leading to pure abstraction sprang partly from realism, partly from futurism and cubism.

One may well wonder what possibilities will be offered to the artists by this young Dutch School so heterogeneous in its mode of expression; what sort of future masterpieces this new Renaissance in painting will contribute to the world of Art! But it may safely be said that true artists, gifted with real talent will infuse the new School with a life made of their ardent hopes, unshaken faith and indefatigable labor.

Polish Art

The Polish Nation from its very inception created art which expressed its relation to the soul of the universe and the surrounding nature. Down to this day its most essential characteristics have been preserved and assert themselves in peasant art. The Polish painter does not limit himself exclusively to the outer forms of his surroundings, but endeavors to penetrate, and convey to the canvas, the internal character of man and object.

To gain a true insight of the nature and development of modern and contemporary Polish art, it becomes necessary after passing over the chronicles of past centuries, to familiarize one's self with the background out of which this art has grown.

Poland was deprived of its political entity and independence at the close of the eighteenth century, when it was dismembered by three neighboring powers. Its people, in spite of their exuberant temperament, deprived of the opportunity of political expansion, concentrated their intellectual values in science and art.

Profound mourning engulfed the entire nation and soon this mood found its reflection in the art of the period. Great poets comforted the nation with hope of a brighter future, reëstablished confidence in the coming glorious era, and exhorted the masses to action. In the midst of funereal rhythms and melancholy, Chopin sounded in his Polonaises heroic chords of faith in the prophesied moment of resurrection. Art became the nation's mission. The era of mystic, contemplative meditation was supplanted by a period of historical painting. This same tendency manifested itself in letters. Its clearly defined aims were to depict the splendid tradition and historical episodes of the national existence, and to excite and maintain the national consciousness of the rising generation already born under foreign rule.

However, in the unrestrained reversion to the past lay the jeopardy of romanticism, destined to create a nation of dreamers, absorbed in the past, lacking energy and initiative to face everyday life. Where was to be found the source of fresh spiritual vigor and untouched energy? Intuitively the thoughts turned to the Polish village with its uncorrupted, unyielding Polish peasantry, clinging obstinately to their native tongue and soil.

We view this village life in the canvases of Stanislawski, Ruszcyc, Czajkowski, Filipkiewicz, Jarocki, Podgorski, and others, through the penetrating, searching eyes of the artist, just as it is—unblemished, Polish!

Olga de Boznanska paints portraits characterized by depth of expression. Her original technique and unusual handling of colors show an individuality not limited by any particular school of painting.

Waclaw Borowski represents a group of young artists who are constantly seeking new channels for the expression of their talent and are grouped in a society named "RYTM." Borowski's compositions are striking in their decorative features, beautiful in the conception and presentation of the theme, and enhanced by fresh harmony of colors.

Mela Muter has taken for the subject of her painting the inward traits of man. She belongs to the impressionistic school, although her latest canvases evidence interest in the new efforts of the young generation of Parisian artists.

Stanislaw Podgorski, with his boldly finished canvases is a true representative of the school formed at Cracow by Professor Stanislawski.

In the paintings exhibited, regardless of school or subject, one sees the distinct national entity of Polish art.

Belgian Art

A characteristic of Belgian Art is the tendency to remain faithful to national traditions—traditions which gave the work of Jordaens and Rubens such a natural vigor, such a healthful glow. The artist's wholesome temperament found its inspiration in the jovial living models whom the great masters portrayed. A slight sensuality, a touch of materialism may be seen in these productions, which lack spirituality—excepting the paintings of certain artists of Latin descent.

However, the present movement in Belgium is a desire for change, the efforts toward which manifest themselves in a great variety of individual expressions.

If one is at all informed of the present state of advanced painting in France, he must see that our younger generation of painters, sympathetic as they may be, feel the need of directing their energy into other channels, and are going to such art centers as Paris for fresh sources of inspiration.

But along with the young artists, swayed by the storm of present fashion, we have a galaxy of great painters who jealously guard their personality without sacrificing themselves to new theories or techniques.

Czechoslovak Paintings

The ten Czechoslovak painters who, this year for the first time in America, are representing their young Republic, form only a small part of that artistic community in Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia, and Slovakia, which, resting on a thousand-year artistic tradition, is trying to express artistically the forms and spirit of its country. Paintings of Slavic nations are characterized by their bright coloring, tinged with a slight melancholic tone. There is seen a dynamic inclination towards ornamentation, with a great harmonic feeling of rhythm which induces the artist to forget the sad story of daily life.

The artists represented in this International Exhibition form a group half way between the conservatism of descriptive realism and modern simplicity. Their work has been influenced by the artistic impressions of Western Europe, especially France, as was the work of the renowned painters, Josef Manes and Mikulas Ales.

Max Svabinsky is a portrait painter and an epical poet of natural creative power. Jakub Obrovsky, Karel Spillar, and T. F. Simon, the last well known in America for his etchings, symbolize the colorfulness of the Czechoslovak meadows, fields, and forests. Vratislav Nechleba, portrait painter, idolizing Rembrandt, remains a strict realist, whereas the Slavic character of motives, influenced by Parisian chic, is manifested in the allegoric conceptions of Alfons Mucha, author of a number of Parisian posters and the immense work "Slavonic Epopoeia."

The works of Nejedli, Benes, Hudecek, and Kalvoda, landscape painters, glorify nature, and in their bright coloring produce an impressive decorative effect.

Czechoslovakian Art is not aristocratic, but is popular in the true sense of the word, reflecting the vital and political traditions of an old nation, now a young republic. Its purpose is to beautify everyday life by lauding nature.

Russian Art

Russian art, like Russian letters, music, and the stage, eloquently typifies the national consciousness. It presents a complex and appealing fusion of fact and fantasy, of observation and imagination. There exists in virtually every phase of Slavic aesthetic activity this same perplexing combination, this same perpetual dualism. With the Russian artist whether writer, composer, painter, or sculptor, you never indeed know when the world of actuality is to blend into the kingdom of dreams, or when, out of this dream world, is to emerge some indisputable verity of soul or sense. The reasons for such a situation are not far to seek. They reside in the fact that in the Slav meet and merge two distinctive strains—the realism of the West, and the mysticism of the East. There is, in brief, scarcely a single artist in all Russia who has not felt the play of these opposing forces, who does not, in some measure, bring to his creative effort this twin heritage.

From the days of the Europeanized and Europeanizing Peter and Catherine down to comparatively recent times, it was the fashion in Russia to emulate and imitate foreign modes, whether Dutch, French, Teutonic, or Italian. It was the ambition of every Russian of taste to become a "Westerner." Of late, however, matters have changed. The Slavic artist of to-day looks within rather than without. The Russian sculptor, who a decade or so ago succumbed to the influence of Rodin, now turns to native wood carving or falls under the mystic spell of ikonic inspiration. And similarly, the painter who not long since affected the heavy tonality of Munich academicist, or the delicate ambience of Gallic impressionist, is at present reverting to a typically nationalistic expression, to an art that is more decorative than representative in spirit.

Of the four important post-war exhibitions of Russian art on foreign soil, America has seen two—the one held at the Brooklyn Museum last season, and the one recently on view at the Grand Central Palace, New York. In addition, we have had during the past half dozen years, not less than twenty different individual displays, the most significant being those devoted respectively to the paintings of Anisfeld, Roerich, Grigoriev, Sorin, Fechin, and the decorative stage designer, Sergei Sudeykin. Add to these the collective exhibitions of sculpture by Sudbinin, Archipenko, and the Caucasin, Gurdjan, and we can boast of no inconsiderable familiarity with contemporary Russian art.

The timely appearance of Anisfeld, Roerich, Fechin, Grigoriev, Sorin, Jakovlev, Shukhaiev, and their compatriots in the current exhibition at the Carnegie Institute, offers further opportunity to consider at close range the aims and achievements of these same talented Slavs. In particular is one struck by the variety of theme and treatment, and the generous range of individual expression, here in evidence. One and all, these men are richly endowed with the precious asset of personality. Each presents a definitely formulated aesthetic physiognomy. You here meet a sensitive and articulate response to conditions physical and social as well as artistic. The typically Nordic Roerich, the sensuous, colorful Anisfeld, the savant neo-classic perfection of Sorin and Jakovlev, the graphic virility of Grigoriev, and the searching characterization of Fechin, are cases in point.

The general impression deriving from the production of these men is one of distinct creative vitality. Art with the Slavs is more a matter of inspiration than a matter of industry. Its basis is emotional, rather than intellectual, and that is perhaps why alike in letters, music, and painting the Russ possesses for us an appeal so potent. Given favorable opportunity for development, it is not impossible that the Slavic artist may yet be able to reconcile the two divergent viewpoints—the objective and the subjective. He may yet bring to the realistic and scientific West something of the perennial mystery of the East.

Contemporary Swedish Painting

Swedish Art had a period of brilliancy towards the end of the nineteenth century. Then, a whole generation of young painters responded to the call of French genius which in the Art of that period was shining in all its splendour. Young Swedish artists in Paris, working assiduously in the different schools, became imbued with the doctrines of Naturalism and Impressionism, and afterwards, their student days ended, they took back to their native country the new ideas and teaching from which they had profited.

Yet, in spite of their minds being opened by the expression of young French Art, and of having followed the example of Manet, Bastien-Lepage and other such leaders, they remained Swedish. Their return to their own land was heralded by a budding-forth of an Art which was at the same time both very personal and very natural. Among the great names of Swedish painters of this period may be cited Josephson, Zorn, Carl Larsson, Liljefors, Nordstrom, and Kreuger.

They even founded in Paris the "League of Swedish Painters," whose first exhibitions at Stockholm proved a victory over the barren conservatism of the Academy and were the signal for the renewal of the Art of Painting and Sculpture in Sweden. This League became a School and it is to this association that Swedish Art owes the names of Prince Eugene, de Hennigs, Wilhelmson, Sjoeberg, Fjaestad and many more, who in our day, continue to carry out the fine traditions of its founders and preserve for their country the place they conquered among the different artistic groups of Europe and America.

The consequences of the evolution of Modern Art have been felt in Sweden as in every other country. Youth, impatient for quick results and eager to see individual originality manifest itself, has strayed away from the beaten paths of Academism, neglecting the results acquired by his predecessors, and loses himself often in fantasy and exaggeration, which he permits no law and no tradition to limit.

The young people of our time, in spite of having given many proofs of talent, have not learned to forget the ways of their elders. They too go to drink at the Fountain of Art on the banks of the Seine, but although bringing back with them new ideas and new impulses, they do not show proof of essentially Swedish qualities.

The new methods of teaching, with their unhealthy seeking after individualism at any cost and their lack of a definite ideal to be attained, have caused the Swedish student of today to follow a sort of Cosmopolitan Art which, though it may possess many fine qualities, is incapable of inspiring the works which should preserve to Sweden the place conquered for it with so much brilliance.

Italian Art

THE Italy of our time is different from the Italy of old. From a congeries of localities more or less independent, each with its own culture notably different from the others, it has changed into a confederation of kindred regions which tend to reach mutual adjustments as against larger groups more different still. Italy is now irrevocably set upon the road of unification; the pressure of the age is all towards the absorption of merely local peculiarities into a larger cultural synthesis.

Perhaps it is not too fanciful to discern the consequence of this state of affairs in the general aspect of the nineteen paintings which form Italy's contribution to the Twenty-third International Exhibition. Their differences among themselves are not so marked as their common difference from the other national groups. To be sure, in their technical characteristics these pictures—like those of all the other countries represented—acknowledge the supremacy of Paris; but they impart to the international language of painting a racial accent as unmistakable as it is indefinable. It is not solely an affair of subject-matter, although that contributes its share to the general impression. It is more essentially an affair of different social environments distilled into different types of mentality. So that Mancini's technical rugosity and Romagnoli's technical sleekness, disparate as they appear, both embody a way of regarding the world which is distinguishable from that of the other nations.

The Italian group here seems to be, more closely than the other national groups, on the track of purely visual reality. The Spaniards, for instance, indulge in a certain dramatic heightening of appearances which gives their pictures an air of being staged; the French, for another, are largely occupied with the problem of decoration, which in some instances practically excludes all others; and so the list might be extended. But the predominating trait of the Italians is optical faithfulness to things seen. That is why the technical characteristics of their painting stem back to the Impressionists and the latter's preoccupation with pigmental vibration as a means of rendering atmospheric variations. Success in this type of painting requires quick perceptions, keen sensitiveness to color, an eye for the subtlest of nature's changes, a high degree of virtuosity; and the existence of these qualities in the painters of contemporary Italy is amply evidenced by this spacious roomful of paintings.

Contemporary Spanish Painting

The Gallery of Spanish Paintings presents a very vital and brilliant résumé of what Spanish art signifies today. It represents not only the different tendencies and the distinct aesthetic credos but also that other outward diversity—the deep and intimate accent of figure and settings characteristic of each region. Among the five or six important painters to whom the actual supremacy of Spanish art today is due are Anglada, Zuloaga, Mesquita, Joaquin Mir, Santiago Rusiñol and Sotomayor.

Anglada is the soul of Spain—his canvases "abound in brilliant contrasts of masculine, almost brutal strength of conception, strangely mingled with almost feminine delicacy of execution." Anglada is the supreme inebriation of color, for color's sake. All processes are lost sight of, and there is evoked the illusion that it is not a painted canvas we have before us, but a work in ceramics, in tapestry, in Japanese lacquer or Persian silks, woven into a splendid richness of design.

Zuloaga, on the other hand, follows in the classic footsteps of Goya, Velasquez and El Greco. He at once exalts and reproaches his country's aspects, her mysticism, her physical degenerations, her austere landscape, her convulsive and cruel ferocity. He loves Spain and shows her as she is, that she may become what she ought.

Mesquita, of Granada, is today the leading portrait painter of Spain. He is reflecting truthfully his own epoch as did other classic masters—Rembrandt, Frans Hals, El Greco and Goya.

Joaquin Mir represents the lyric impulse, the idealistic force of contemporary Spanish art. Color in his hands is an inexhaustible hoard. Surroundings pass him unobserved. He has but searching looks, profound, absorbing, ardent for the polychromatic transports, and the caprices of light in union with color.

Santiago Rusiñol is the dreaming romanticist expressed in classic perfection. Like Maeterlinck, he loves silence, the placid nooks, the shady solitudes, old abandoned palaces, distant perspectives, the boxes, myrtles and flowering laurel, set in architectural design.

A modern magic of color, as well as a broad spiritual serenity, magnifies the painting of Sotomayor. He is decisive and sure. He achieves a miraculous sensation of life in motion, expressed with decorative power and a chromatic splendor that places him among the foremost contemporary Spanish painters.

In José Pinazo there flowers an intimate type of painting. The feminine soul has at last found its interpreter.

In Valentin and Ramòn de Zubiaurre, one may appreciate in all its ripeness the diversity of their talent and temper.

Valentin is reflective and melancholy, loves the quiet notes, the tender sentiments. Rarely does his painting smile. Sadness, dreamings, nostalgia, mark the subtle aristocracy of his heart, mind and vision.

Ramòn is less intense. He is an optimist, merry, and even jocose at times. He loves vibrant notes and the darting shafts of color. While Valentin seeks the shaded by-paths, Ramòn enjoys, in the open, the exuberance of color.

Aurelio Arteta gives us the more impassioned and tender daily episodes of homely life.

The paintings of José Gutierrez Solana are unvaryingly disquieting and harsh like the destitute lives about whom Dostoyevski wrote.

Space is lacking in which to eulogize the noble virtuosity and the keen sensibility of Vazquez Diaz; the intimate essence of Sorollanism refined in the delicate and caressing greys and nacres of José Mongrell; the interiors of temple and convent of the Sevillian, Alfonso Grosso; the intimate scenes of Martí Garcés; the barroque Atlantic exaltations of Nestor; the strong constructive energy of Gonzalo Bilbao; the scintillating scenes of circus and theatre which Ricardo Urgell paints like collections of precious gems; the murky waters of harbor and wharves which are the specialty of Martinez-Cubells; and finally, Tito Cittadini, the Argentine, whose vital, artistic temperament has incorporated into Spanish painting the fresh vigor and new tonal symphonies of the sun, the sea and the glowing soil of the incomparable Mallorca.
